I. COMPRENSIÓN DE UN TEXTO:

FAKE AUTOBIOGRAPHIES

In March 2008, a book called "Love and Consequences" was published. It was written by Margaret B. Jones, who claimed that she was half white and half Native American and that at the age of eight, she was sent to live with a foster family. She described how she sold drugs for a local gang and how she carried illegal guns. The book achieved worldwide success; however, the entire story happened to be a fake. The woman posing as "Margaret Jones" was in reality Margaret Selzer, who is white and grew up in a prosperous neighbourhood with her biological family. This isn't the first autobiography to be exposed as a fake. Yet, what causes people to invent these fictitious life stories? Many people simply do it for the money. Personal stories written by people about their troubled childhood have become more and more popular in recent years. Perhaps it's the obsession with reading true stories about people's lives that's causing writers to invent them. But, as long as a story is entertaining, does it really matter whether it's fictional or real?
