IS FOOTBALL SEXIST?

Two men, presenter Richard Keys and ex-footballer Andy Gray, have now both left Sky but their comments have brought the issue of sexual discrimination to the forefront. The men, who were reporting on Sky's coverage of the Wolves vs Liverpool Premier League game, made negative remarks about assistant referee Sian Massey's ability to do her job because she was a woman, suggesting that she "did not know the offside rule". The pair were initially suspended but further allegations of sexist behaviour got Gray being fired by the broadcaster, while Keys subsequently resigned.

The coach of the England Women's football team, Hope Powell, claims that the controversy has helped the women's game. Powell told BBC Sport: "Obviously it's a shame, you don't want to hear those sorts of comments. But we've had really good publicity this week." She went on: "Sian earned the right to be there and, more importantly she made some really fantastic calls, which can only be good for women in the game."

New research has revealed that women footballers are tougher than their male counterparts. According to scientists at the University of West England (UWE) in Bristol, women are more robust because of psychological and sociological factors which affect their attitude to pain, injury and risk.

Sociologist John Bird said that women "believe they have to ignore injuries, for example, to keep their place on the team or to support the team."
